The recipient of this year's award is longtime activist

Paul Magno

Paul believes that the Martin Luther King, Jr. articulation of the "giant triplets of racism, militarism and extreme materialism" remains compelling over 50 years after King's murder and suggests that what we often analyze as structural injustice is a complex and comprehensive tapestry of violence plaguing and deforming virtually every aspect of life on Earth.

His own background centered in many years' participation in the Catholic Worker movement, Paul has worked with and supported many causes in the past (notably its solidarity with Puerto Rico's liberation movement), and has spent his career advocating for the poor and marginalized. He is a resident of Baltimore's Jonah House, a 45-year-old faith-based community committed to nonviolent resistance to war and kindred oppressions.

Paul's previous roles, in addition to Pax Christi, include the coordination of peacemaking and human rights activities at such organizations as Witness for Peace, TASSC International, Consistent Life, Washington Peace Center, Father McKenna Center, Guatemala Partners/Rights Action, and the Quixote Center.

Pax Christi Metro DC-Baltimore is a region of Pax Christi USA, a national section of Pax Christi International. Rooted in the Gospel and Catholic Social Teaching, we witness to Jesus' message and example of nonviolence, rejecting war and affirming the sacredness of human life and the interdependence of all creation.
